

It is my opinion and preference that Indiana's Telephone Privacy Law is, in its current form and utility, precisely what the residents of Indiana need and desire. As a bureacratic institution, it is your obligation to uphold and ensure the rights of citizens. I believe the right to privacy of individual citizens should take precedence over the rights of corporate America to solicit over the telephone, regardless of the familiar relationship between business and consumer. It would be irresponsible, I think, to allow those businesses possessing "established business relationship(s)" to obstruct personal privacy at their leisure. At least consider mandating that businesses first acquire consumer consent. It is my feeling that individuals should decide the limits of their civil privacy, this should not be held subject to some "established business relationship."
